

Maria von Trapp

Though many of the details in the beloved musical The Sound of Music are wrong, one thing it gets right is Maria von Trapp's love for the von Trapp children. In fact, she agreed to Georg von Trapp's marriage proposal because in it he asked her to become his children's second mother - she later admitted, "If he had only asked me to marry him I might not have said yes." (Maria did grow to love her husband.)

It was lucky for the von Trapps that Maria married into their family in 1927. She managed to overcome their dire financial situation in the 1930's by getting them to take in boarders, cut expenses and start performing as a singing group. After the Nazi party came to power, a pregnant Maria helped her husband and their nine children - the seven von Trapp children she'd adopted, plus two youngsters she had given birth to - leave Austria in 1938. The real-life Maria was determined enough that she probably could've shepherded her family over the Alps, but the von Trapps didn't follow the route depicted in the movie. Instead, using the excuse of a vacation, Maria and her family took a train to Italy.
